

THE ELECTION BILL DEBATE.
Speeches of Senator Spooner and Ingalls.

The most prominent feature of Schuyler's oratorial debate was Mr. Spooner's speech on the election bill. It was a powerful effort and on all sides was acknowledged to be the strongest argument yet put forth by the friends of the measure. It was followed by the closest attention by a more than ordinarily large number of Senators and occupants of the galleries.

The surprise of the day, though, was the projection of Senator Ingalls into the discussion. No one expected him to say anything prior to some definite action by the Kansas legislature, and agreed many Senators erroneously supposed he had left the city. If Mr. George was one of those latter class he probably discovered his error before the Senate adjourned. Mr. Ingalls made no direct argument in favor of the bill, but did make his stand upon the constitution of the state of Massachusetts, and the condition of the colored voters of that commonwealth under the newly arranged political map.

SPOONER AND SAWYER.

Senator Spooner is undoubtedly one of the most popular men in the national legislature, as well as republicans concurring in all the good things which are constantly being done. Some senators are on the decline side now, and are no longer of much influence for the Wisconsin statesman, but none of them feel as affectionately toward him as does his venerable colleague, Senator Sawyer. When Spooner was the last of his epoch, he was a leader, brilliant, witty, and particularly magnetic influence over the old gentleman. At one time Mr. Sawyer arose from his seat and faced the orator with an expression of loving pride on his face that no artist could catch, not even his master, during his career. In the five minutes he stood in his contention, his eyes fixed on the Speaker. So motionless was he that for a time he attracted more attention than did Mr. Spooner. The orator reached a climax with a sight that was death-like, and the northward seat was occupied again by Mr. Sawyer resumed his seat. It was a pleasing bit of unconscious adoration.

VANDALISM IN A NAVY YARD.

Efforts to Sink United States Vessels at Brooklyn by Discharged Employees.

The Secretary of the Navy has a new problem before him. He will have as soon as the machinery of his office gets to him that promises to become one of the most ticklish and delicate side issues in an otherwise quiet session of the Wisconsin statesman, but none of them feel as affectionately toward him as does his venerable colleague, Senator Sawyer.
